Zoosk from app store

What: Apple's App Store suffered a noticeable outage at noon on Friday. How: Some failed to load the App Store. Others couldn't download. Why you care: The App Store is your primary path to new apps, app updates, and in-app purchases. If you're offline, none of this is available to you. We're sure it's all back now. It's not just you. One of the advantages of having such a deep well of technology articles here at Lifewire is the ability to see what's happening in the world based on which of our articles starts to get extraordinarily high traffic. DownDetector.com Today, we noticed an article about iPhones that don't download apps rise to the top of our current traffic. A quick check of Downtdetector.com (a website dedicated to knowing which internet sites are experiencing problems) showed us that the App Store crashed a few hours ago. It is still struggling so far, although Lifewire employees appear to be able to download and update apps. Apple's own status page says the App Store is having a problem, which affects some users. Apple Typically, these types of outages are met quickly by Apple; chances are that the App Store will be back soon. Until then, you can see if it's off for you trying to download or update apps on your iOS device of choice. The official Apple Store app is an easy and convenient way to browse and buy new Apple products just from your iPhone. It is available through the App Store as a free download. The Apple Store app also lets you purchase accessories for Apple products, schedule Genius Bar appointments at your local Apple Retail Store, and even express payment for purchases while in the store via EasyPay. After you install the app from the Apple Store, you're ready to start browsing and buying products. The main menu displays a list of product categories to choose from. At its core, the Apple Store app is essentially a custom iPhone version of the Apple Online Store. Unfortunately, the Apple Store app in its current form is not optimized for the iPad. However, you can still download and run it on any iPad. Almost everything you can access by going to store.apple.com on a desktop computer is available through the Apple Store app. If you are buying an iPod, you can even request a custom recording through the app. For those who live near an Apple Retail Store, you can order pickups if they are available for the product you are ordering. For those who order a new Mac computer, you can configure your custom options the way you would through the full Apple Online Store. Then you can track your order and even subscribe to push notifications when a product sends or changes status. If you need to sign in to the local apple store for something, you can schedule a Genius Bar appointment in advance through the Apple Store app and even add it only to your calendar. The app can then notify you when your query is coming so you don't forget. When you arrive at the Apple Store, you can check in check-in naming using the Apple Store app and even using it to pay for purchases via EasyPay, which greatly minimizes your wait time. Anyone who has ever been in a crowded Apple Store will appreciate easypay. Whether you're planning a trip to your local Apple Store and want to expedite your visit or just want to have the added convenience of ordering your products online, the Apple Store app is the best way to do both. Software stores focused on higher-demand PC software, even large cashier retailers have stopped transporting Mac software. Then Apple created the Apple Store, a retail paradise that finally gave Mac users a place to get software. But that has also changed, as slots for the iPod, iPhone and iPad have taken over Apple's limited space on the store shelf. Things seemed terrible until the end of 2010, when Apple pulled the wraps out of the Mac App Store. It has the same ease of use as the App Store for iOS apps, uses the same credentials—your Apple ID—and allows Mac users to securely download mac-controlled apps from certified developers. The results were spectacular—millions of Mac users now have access to the Mac App Store, which has been included in all copies of the operating system since OS X Lion was released, allowing developers to reach a base of Mac customers they've never had access to before. Is Nokia about to launch an app store for its Symbian platform at next week's Mobile World Congress in Barcelona? That's the internet rumor this morning. The Russian-language blogger and editor of Russia's largest mobile technology website, Mobile-review.com, Eldar Murtazin, claims to have seen Nokia's new app store, according to a translation of Unwired View. I'm sorry, was that confusing? So let me recap: according to one blogger, who discovered by another blogger, who claims to have seen it with his own eyes, Nokia is about to launch an app store. Clear as mud? Good! Kidding aside, an app store for Nokia is not so unlikely. Nokia invested heavily in acquiring Symbian and then expanded the OS through an open source alliance with Samsung, LG, Sharp and others. Nokia already has some distribution platforms for Symbian applications, but nothing that is particularly cohesive or attractive to users and developers. Centralized app stores seem to be in all anger since Apple launched its successful iPhone app store via iTunes. Google has already tried to repeat this success for its own Android operating system with Android Fellow Symbianite Samsung opened its own app store last week, and now the Wall Street Journal says Microsoft can get into the app action with an online bazaar. With all these new online stores for mobile devices, I suppose you could say that the mobile phone industry is going app sh-- for apps.
